

Registered Nursing Schools

In the United States, nursing is considered one of the largest health care professions. There are more than 2.7 million registered nurses nationwide. Presently, the nursing industry is still growing at a fast pace, since nurses are the primary providers of hospital patient care and comprise a majority of the strength of hospital staff. Over the years, many nursing schools have flourished in different states and offer various types of nursing education. It includes registered nursing degrees, RN to BSN programs, RN to MSN programs, licensed practical nursing schools, CNA training, and Parish Nursing. Aspiring nurses should make detailed inquiries before enrolling at a nursing school, as there are some universities offering nursing programs that are not registered or affiliated. Enrolling into registered nursing schools ensures that potential healthcare employers, graduate schools, and nursing professional organizations legitimately recognize the coursework, diplomas, or degrees earned. The United States has a number of registered nursing schools in different states. The American Career College in California is a registered institution and one of the largest and most respected training schools. It offers short and intensive nursing programs of eight to ten months. The University of Phoenix in Colorado offers suitable, competent, and valuable nursing programs that are targeted towards the working professional. Registered nursing schools are those schools that have been recognized by non-governmental associations and have been found to meet basic standards or exceed the criteria of educational quality. Presently, there are two nationally recognized accreditation organizations for nursing, the National League of Nursing Accrediting Commission and the Commission on Collegiate Nursing Education. Authorization of nursing schools by these organizations help improving the resources, processes, and results of nursing schools. It also helps monitor the certificate, diploma, and degree offerings in nursing science, which is in close relation with state examination and licensing rules. Although schools that are registered by either of the organizations are acceptable, its advisable that students look for registered nursing schools that are recognized by both the organizations.
