March 29 2008 - Officials with Starbucks have stated that they will be waiting a little longer before they begin to display the calorie counts on menus at their New York City stores.

Originally they were going to begin posting calorie info pertaining to food and drink products this Monday but that will now not be the case.

On Thursday, Starbucks released a statement saying, "We believe nutrition information should be readily available."

Yesterday they retracted that statement: "Starbucks will be fully compliant with the regulation when it goes into effect," they stated.
