

Home Health Care Nurses

The profession of nursing is considered one of the most noble and respectable of vocations. A nurse is looked upon with great admiration and respect that tends to ill people with care, irrespective of any racial and social differences. The nursing profession offers a variety of roles to choose from, based on the work place and practice areas that an individual may opt for. Some major areas of specialization for nurses include office nurses, hospital nurses, public health nurses, nursing home nurses, and home health care nurses. As the name suggests, home health care nurses provide care and service to patients at their homes. They specialize in providing specific care and support required to home-based patients. They are specially trained since the environments and facilities available at home differ largely from that of hospitals and nursing homes. Home care nurses can be employed for taking care of various kinds of patients such as those suffering from chronic illnesses, those recovering from accidents, physical or mental injuries and patients with needs of special care due to terminal illnesses or childbirth. Services provided by these nurses may be availed for a short duration or a long-term service as prescribed by the attending physician. Home health care nurses can be associated with some hospital or private organization, or work independently. Home health care nurses assess the environment of the home of the patient. They provide instructions and guidance to family members on how to deal with illness based on the current condition of the patient. Several home health care nursing associations are involved in home health care practice, research, education, and administration. They are committed to improve the quality of home health care nursing and refine the conceptual aspects of the profession. Individuals interested in educating themselves in home health care nursing can become a registered member of such an association online and join in the discussion forums or contact them directly.

About the Author

A directory listing of hospitals and medical centers in the Boston, Massachusetts.

Source: <http://www.products herbal.com>